

I am a subscriber of XM Radio and I don't believe I see the problem the NAB has with XM or Sirius or any satellite company offering weather or traffic. We as subscribers have the right to that since we pay a monthly premium and as long as they offer parental controls and make their users aware of the substance of programming, there shouldn't be any other organizations that have any right to censure the aforementioned companies. The whole point of satellite radio is to be able to travel long distances listening to the same station or same format of stations. So it is just common sense that a person who is travelling would want to know the traffic or weather conditions of certain cities that they may be en route to. Overall I really don't feel that something that works should be fixed if it isn't broken. The government's policies all too often tend to be fix until it's broken, ruin far too many things and this is something that should just be left alone.
